

We are concerned the FCC may override the Indiana State Indiana Telephone Privacy Act and adopting a lower national standard. We have put our phone number on the Indiana 'no-call' list and the number of calls has dropped dramatically. Instead of 10-12 calls per evening we now get one 1 per month. The reduction in the interruptions is very nice as it gives us (my husband and I) uninterrupted time to talk to each other, and me time to do homework (I am in grad school). In the past when the phone would ring in the middle of a discussion or my homework it is distracting and then we have to figure out where we left off once the call is complete. Currently I know when the phone rings it won't be a telemarketer and it will be someone I wish to talk to. I have never once purchased anything from a telemarketer, and if I am interested in their service I would seek them out. I don't need anyone bothering me at home. I do not think that the FCC should implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections.

Thanks,
